The colder weather of the last week is a timely reminder that winter is on its way. This means that our older cats, dogs and horses will start feeling their tired joints a bit more.

Osteoarthritis is an incredibly common condition in veterinary practice, and the most common condition seen in small animal patients.

Fortunately these days we have a range of treatments available to help prevent, or slow down the progression of arthritis, and to minimize the pain experienced due to this condition.

If you have an older animal, and think they are not quite their usual selves, are lame, stiff to rise, have trouble getting up or down, then feel free to speak to us about what we can do to keep them comfortable and on the go!
